93RD YEAR | GETTYSBURG, PA., WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1911 | NO. 27

NO INCREASE IN R. R. RATES

THE W. M. WILL NOT RAISE PASSENGER RATES IN PA.

The Action of County Commissioners and their Attorney Causes Reversal of Raise Orders

The Western Maryland R. R. Co. did not begin the selling of fares on last Thursday at the new rate of three cents a mile. The agents had received instructions to start the new rate on that day but on the day before the order was to go into effect notices were received to continue the old rate of two cents a mile.

The warning received from the County Commissioners of Adams county through their counsel, J. L. Williams, Esq., of this place was direct cause for the abandonment of the proposed raise of rates and the county officials are entitled to much credit for their action.

Whatever merit or reason the proposed action might have had was obscured by the fact that the proposed raise was only to be between points in Pennsylvania. Why travelers in this State should be punished by a raise in rates while travelers in other States through which the road goes should escape such punishment did not clearly appear. The assertion was made that it could be shown that the cost of passenger transportation justified the raise, but such a condition would apply to the whole road and not to a particular portion located in any state and yet it was proposed that Pennsylvania travelers should bear the brunt of the raise. To raise the rate all over the line would have caused the road to have submitted the matter to the Inter-State Commission, which the raise in one State would not occasion.

As Gettysburg is the best passenger traffic point on the W. M. R. R. for a town of its size, travel to this place from points within the State would have caught the punishment of this raise. It was but natural and proper for the protest to come from this point. The road only last year had a demonstration of the enthusiastic work of our people for an encampment from which the W. M. R. R. reaped large results and our people are in the mood of desiring to have this place appreciated instead of injured by a raise of rates. It is to be hoped that the railroad will entirely abandon any proposed raise of rates.

Washington R. R. Coming North.

The County Commissioners of Montgomery County, Maryland have granted to the Washington, Westminster and Gettysburg Railroad Company a permit to construct a railroad through Montgomery county and to cross the public roads wherever necessary, the understanding that all crossings, wherever practicable, be carried overhead or underground. This permit conveys the road to the Howard County line, the corner of latter county must be crossed as well as the entire length of Carroll County to reach the Pennsylvania line.

The surveys of this road have been completed and the work of grading was started several months ago in the District of Columbia and was stopped by the Public Service Commission because of failure of the Company to comply with certain requirements. It is understood the work of construction will be resumed soon, the difficulties having been overcome.

Nearly three miles of the road has already been graded and Washington people entertain convictions that the road is going to be built beyond all doubt. It is said by some that the road will become one of the Pennsylvania's lines, connecting with the Frederick branch near Littlestown and will give that company a greatly need outlet for its southern trade. This view questions whether the Frederick branch or Gettysburg would be the main objective point but in Washington it is believed that the road will go to Gettysburg.

W. M. Orders New Equipment.

The Western Maryland Railroad Company has placed an order for 40 new engines and 35 passenger cars, to be delivered as soon as possible. Five of the engines will be the regulation passenger size and will be used between Cumberland and Baltimore. The others will be the heavy freight engines similar to those now employed and will be used over the entire system.

Results from a R. R. Wreck

On December 4, 1910 there was a big freight wreck on the W. M. R. R. near Maria Furnace in this county, fifteen coal cars leaving the track. One of the two injured trainmen was George H. Folk of Hanover. A few days after the accident Mr. Folk was able to be on the street, and no serious results were anticipated, as he had received only a few visible scalp wounds. Several weeks later, however, he began to suffer excruciating pain in his head and his mind became affected.

The family physician, Dr. H M. Alleman, advised his removal to a hospital for treatment, and on January 9th, accompanied by Dr. Alleman he was taken to the Union Protestant Infirmary, in Baltimore, where he underwent an operation January 23d. The operation, which was successful, revealed a fracture of the skull and clots of blood on the brain. Since the operation he is rational, and is getting along nicely, with the exception of his limbs, at this time being unable to walk a step, and has very little, if any control of his arms. The doctors in charge of the case at the hospital, give Mrs. Folk every assurance that he will regain his usual health of body and mind.

Big Saving by W. M. R. R.

The Western Maryland Railroad will not have to do any new financing to provide money for the necessary equipment for the Cumberland extension, now in course of construction. The financial condition of the company is in such splendid shape that cash payment can be made for any new cars and locomotives needed on the extension, thus obviating the necessity for issuing equipment trust certificates. It is understood that the cost of the extension now being built will be considerably less than the appropriation, which was $13,000,000. It is said that cost will be about $1,500,000 less than the amount appropriated.

Col. Beitler Resigns.

Col. Lewis E. Beitler, Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth, and well known in Gettysburg, has handed in his resignation as Deputy Secretary, to take effect March 1, when he will have finished sixteen years of official life at Harrisburg. He has been attending every National Guard camp in Gettysburg in that period. Governor Hastings selected Colonel Beitler as his private secretary. At the end of the Hastings term he was made Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth, holding the position under Governors Stone, Pennypacker and Stuart. He was appointed to the military staff of Governor Stone and served in like positions under Governors Pennypacker and Stuart. In forming his staff Governor Tener did not reappoint Col. Beitler, which was the first intimation that he would not remain as deputy to Secretary of Commonwealth McAfee. Colonel Beitler goes into business in Philadelphia.

We wonder whether the Secretary of the Commonwealth's right hand man, Chief Clerk Geo. D. Thorn of this place will not be advanced to the vacant Deputyship, as a well deserved reward for the efficiency with which his department has been conducted.

School House on Fire.

On Friday, Feb. 17th, the Pine Grove school house in Union township, Adams county, caught fire from a defective stove pipe. An alarm was sounded by the school bell, and soon a large number of people from the surrounding neighborhood gathered. A bucket brigade was immediately formed, water being obtained from a nearby well, and the flames were soon extinguished. The fire was confined to the ceiling and roof, with but slight damage. The organ, seats and desks were removed from the building. Fifty dollars will probably cover the loss. Warren Baugher, teacher of the school, worked faithfully, with others to extinguish the flames.

Agricultural Meeting.

The monthly meeting of the Adams County Agricultural Association was held at Biglerville on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 18.

1st Topic, "Fertilizers, Home Mixing and Use," Eli P. Garretson says he believes it would be advisable especially for orchard purposes, to prepare the fertilizers at home. Muriate of Potash to supply the potash, and South Carolina Rock of about 16 per cent to furnish the sulphuric acid, and if some of the legumes such as crimson clover or cow peas are grown to furnish the nitrogen and humus a high grade fertilizer can be secured at a minimum cost, without paying freight on worthless fillers that usually come in some brands of fertilizers.

Discussion by S. Bream, A. Roberts and others.

2nd Topic, "Some of the Mistakes that Many Farmers Make," A. Roberts said one of the mistakes he made some years ago was that he did not paint the cuts when heading back old apple trees He has grown practically new tops on old trees that were on the decline, but the large cuts are now decaying and he fears there will be quite a loss by the new heads getting too heavy to be supported by the decaying stems.

Wm. E Bream said the mistake he made was not taking the advice that one of his neighbors gave him, to plant at least one half of his farm in apple orchard at the time he planted his orchard. Other members also told various mistakes they have made.

3rd Resolved that young men should seek the Trades rather than the Professions.

Samuel Bream said he thinks it depends very much on the man; if a young man is inclined to take up some profession and has a desire to pursue that profession it would be a mistake for him to take a trade which he did not like. He believes he would not make a succes of it where he would without a doubt make a success of that profession which he enjoyed.

It was discussed at length and the general impression was that it would be advisable if more young men would seek the trades rather than the professions.

The Kind You Have Always Bought

CURING A FAD

By W. F. BRYAN

Copyrighted, 1908, by Homer Sprague.

Being fanciful as well as fashionable, Miss Hovey was a faddist, this to the deep sorrow of Dick Fennister, who barely had time to develop an interest in one pursuit before Florence Hovey was off at a new tangent.

Dick had just learned to handle the diabalo when he was called upon to abandon the illusive spinning reel in order to spend his afternoons amid dim lights and odors of incense while a burly Buddhist proclaimed the tenets of fasting and mortification of the flesh to the end that the soul might be enabled to quit its earthly tenement and soar through realms of space.

And then came Batterly. His advent enabled Dick to resume an intimate connection between soul and body and also permitted him to take Florence to luncheon occasionally until Batterly's artistic notions engulfed Miss Hovey even more completely than the Hindoo religion had done.

Batterly knew the value of what actors call "dressing the part," and there was small danger that any one would ever mistake him for other than what he was. The black velvet coat, the straight brimmed high hat and the peg top trousers above sharply pointed French shoes were all delightfully suggestive of the Latin quarter. Florence discarded shirt waists and went in for soft, clinging gowns designed by Batterly. The phraseology of the studio supplanted the words of affection which Dick Fennister had received despite the reigns of other fads.

Things began to look serious, indeed, for Fennister, and none knew it better than himself. Batterly by his very selfishness was the sort of man to attract women, and Dick Fennister feared that if he sought to exercise his rights as a fiance this would serve only to mark the termination of their engagement and precipitate Florence's serious interest in the artist.

Things went from bad to worse, and there came the day when Dick called to take Florence for a walk only to find that she had gone with Batterly. Later it developed that she had gone to his studio to pose for her portrait and that Mrs. Hovey had accompanied them as chaperon, but this did not lighten the situation much.

Thereafter Batterly called daily to escort his sitter to the studio, and with mournful interest Dick watched the trio pass the club window.

Then there came a day when the light of resolve flashed into his eyes, and with positive cheerfulness he turned from the spectacle. Harry Fulton, passing him in the hall, was scandalized to surprise him performing a dance indicative of solemn joy.

"Your own idea?" he asked when Dick saw him and had subsided.

"A poor thing," admitted Dick, "but my own. It is the outward indication of the joy that rises within me."

"It's all right then," was the sarcastic retort. "It seemed rather the outward indication of an inward colic."

He passed on, and Dick headed for the coat room. Ten minutes later he quitted the club.

Mrs. Hovey rather enjoyed the afternoon promenades down the avenue. Batterly's eccentricities, aided by real cleverness with the brush, had made him something of a social lion, and she was proud to have him in leash. She enjoyed the attention which the artist attracted, but this afternoon there was a new expression on the face of those whom they met.

In spite of the occasional "Very clever!" and "How original!" which fell from the lips of passersby there was a flash of levity in the eyes of nearly all. Both Mrs. Hovey and Florence anxiously, if secretly, felt various portions of their dress to see if some disarrangement of their toilets had aroused attention.

But several furtive touches assured them that all was well, and so they gave more attention to Batterly, who reveled in this afternoon parade down the fashionable thoroughfare with the aristocratic matron and her remarkably handsome daughter at his side. He had scorned the suggestion of a carriage, declaring that the walk cleared his brain and enabled him to do his best work.

"This picture shall be my masterpiece," he declared, "if only I am able to do justice to the subject. See! Every one stares at the beauty I am struggling to reproduce upon canvas. It shall make me famous."

"You are already that," reminded Mrs. Hovey. "You will make Florence famous instead."

"No; she is already that," replied the artist. "It needs none to tell that she is the observed of all observers. Today I notice it as never before."

"Do you?" asked Mrs. Hovey uneasily. "It does seem to me that we are attracting unusual attention."

"It is the gown," said Batterly complacently. "It is a triumph. It is a joy to see one's ideals so fittingly realized." He glanced with frank pride at the somewhat conspicuous costume he had designed for Florence and which she was wearing upon the street for the first time. He was inordinately vain, and even the indirect flattery of curious glances was as incense to his soul.

They had almost reached the side street on which Batterly had his studio in an abandoned stable whose rough and dilapidated exterior served only to heighten the effect of the luxurious furnishings within. Suddenly Mrs. Hovey gasped and clutched the artist's arm.

Were it not for the clutch and the feel of bone and muscle beneath she could have sworn that Batterly was advancing toward them with his pompous deliberate stride. Batterly, too, saw the vision and stared.

"It would seem a double," he said. "Tell me, do you see one who looks like me?"

AUDITORS' REPORT.

To the Honorable the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Adams County:

CURING A FAD

By W. F. BRYAN

Copyrighted, 1908, by Homer Sprague.

Being fanciful as well as fashionable, Miss Hovey was a faddist, this to the deep sorrow of Dick Fennister, who barely had time to develop an interest in one pursuit before Florence Hovey was off at a new tangent.

Dick had just learned to handle the diabalo when he was called upon to abandon the illusive spinning reel in order to spend his afternoons amid dim lights and odors of incense while a burly Buddhist proclaimed the tenets of fasting and mortification of the flesh to the end that the soul might be enabled to quit its earthly tenement and soar through realms of space.

And then came Batterly. His advent enabled Dick to resume an intimate connection between soul and body and also permitted him to take Florence to luncheon occasionally until Batterly's artistic notions engulfed Miss Hovey even more completely than the Hindoo religion had done.

Batterly knew the value of what actors call "dressing the part," and there was small danger that any one would ever mistake him for other than what he was. The black velvet coat, the straight brimmed high hat and the peg top trousers above sharply pointed French shoes were all delightfully suggestive of the Latin quarter. Florence discarded shirt waists and went in for soft, clinging gowns designed by Batterly. The phraseology of the studio supplanted the words of affection which Dick Fennister had received despite the reigns of other fads.

Things began to look serious, indeed, for Fennister, and none knew it better than himself. Batterly by his very selfishness was the sort of man to attract women, and Dick Fennister feared that if he sought to exercise his rights as a fiance this would serve only to mark the termination of their engagement and precipitate Florence's serious interest in the artist.

Things went from bad to worse, and there came the day when Dick called to take Florence for a walk only to find that she had gone with Batterly. Later it developed that she had gone to his studio to pose for her portrait and that Mrs. Hovey had accompanied them as chaperon, but this did not lighten the situation much.

Thereafter Batterly called daily to escort his sitter to the studio, and with mournful interest Dick watched the trio pass the club window.

Then there came a day when the light of resolve flashed into his eyes, and with positive cheerfulness he turned from the spectacle. Harry Fulton, passing him in the hall, was scandalized to surprise him performing a dance indicative of solemn joy.

"Your own idea?" he asked when Dick saw him and had subsided.

"A poor thing," admitted Dick, "but my own. It is the outward indication of the joy that rises within me."

"It's all right then," was the sarcastic retort. "It seemed rather the outward indication of an inward colic."

He passed on, and Dick headed for the coat room. Ten minutes later he quitted the club.

Mrs. Hovey rather enjoyed the afternoon promenades down the avenue. Batterly's eccentricities, aided by real cleverness with the brush, had made him something of a social lion, and she was proud to have him in leash. She enjoyed the attention which the artist attracted, but this afternoon there was a new expression on the face of those whom they met.

In spite of the occasional "Very clever!" and "How original!" which fell from the lips of passersby there was a flash of levity in the eyes of nearly all. Both Mrs. Hovey and Florence anxiously, if secretly, felt various portions of their dress to see if some disarrangement of their toilets had aroused attention.

But several furtive touches assured them that all was well, and so they gave more attention to Batterly, who reveled in this afternoon parade down the fashionable thoroughfare with the aristocratic matron and her remarkably handsome daughter at his side. He had scorned the suggestion of a carriage, declaring that the walk cleared his brain and enabled him to do his best work.

"This picture shall be my masterpiece," he declared, "if only I am able to do justice to the subject. See! Every one stares at the beauty I am struggling to reproduce upon canvas. It shall make me famous."

"You are already that," reminded Mrs. Hovey. "You will make Florence famous instead."

"No; she is already that," replied the artist. "It needs none to tell that she is the observed of all observers. Today I notice it as never before."

"Do you?" asked Mrs. Hovey uneasily. "It does seem to me that we are attracting unusual attention."

"It is the gown," said Batterly complacently. "It is a triumph. It is a joy to see one's ideals so fittingly realized." He glanced with frank pride at the somewhat conspicuous costume he had designed for Florence and which she was wearing upon the street for the first time. He was inordinately vain, and even the indirect flattery of curious glances was as incense to his soul.

They had almost reached the side street on which Batterly had his studio in an abandoned stable, whose rough and dilapidated exterior served only to heighten the effect of the luxurious furnishings within. Suddenly Mrs. Hovey gasped and clutched the artist's arm.

Were it not for the clutch and the feel of bone and muscle beneath she could have sworn that Batterly was advancing toward them with his pompous deliberate stride. Batterly, too, saw the vision and stared.

"It would seem a double," he said. "Tell me, do you see one who looks

Spring Sales in Adams County-1911

Spring sales to be successful must have bidders who want the goods sold. Bidders go to sales because of information in hand of stock or property to be sold that they want. The busines of every farmer having a sale is to give information to bidders of what is to be sold so as to induce them to come to sale. In other words every sale should be thoroughly advertised to bring the bidders and make a good sale. The COMPILER has been considered the best medium in the county for the advertisment of spring sales. Send or bring in your sale lists to the COMPILER and make sure that the thousands who read the COMPILER will have the opportunity of knowing what you have to sell and going to your sale for the advertised goods.

ROAD SITUATION.

Senator Sproul offered a bill in the State Senate last week providing for the building by the State of 5000 miles of road connecting County seats and also a bill providing for a constitutional amendment by which a bond issue of fifty million dollars could be created for the building of these roads.

While it is possible that this bill may not go through in the exact form in which presented. While it is possible the people may not vote for a bond issue. Yet, there are many reasone to believe that in the near future there will be legislation for state wide roads built by the State. Governor Tener is in favor of the project and will want to add to the credit of his administration this inauguration of this movement. The United State Government has presented the proof that the American farmer pays 25 cents a ton for hauling his produce while the European gets the same service by reason of good roads for about ten cents The automobile interest will do all they can in favor of the movement for thousands of miles built by the State. There will be many who will believe their communities will be helped as they undoubtedly will by the building of these roads and will be for the movement. There will be many who will be of the opinion that it would be more equitable to throw the burden of building of these roads on the state rather than on the counties and townships for the latter have in cases found the one eighth expense under present law for State roads to be very heavy and burdensome. There may be many who will fear what may result in the spending of fifty millions in Pennsylvania by the State. But in our judgment it looks as though the conditions were ripe for a state wide road building and that the actual building is only a little way ahead.

In view of the situation road building under the present law for making roads at expense to county and township should be done upon roads outside of County seat roads. If the State will in a short time build the road from Gettysburg to Chambersburg, to York, through New Oxford and Abbottstown, to Harrisburg through Heidlersburg and York Springs, to Carlisle, through Biglerville and Bendersville and a southern route, for the Sproul bill provides for connection with roads in neighboring States. These roads being built at the entire expense of the State. County and townships should be saved from any outlay on road that will eventually be built by the State and should spend their money on roads the state will never build at the entire expense of the State. Care should be exercised by the people of the districts not to push the building of roads that will be built when the State wide road building is inaugurated.

THE SCHOOL CODE.

There seems to be a difference of opinion among our people for or against the School code. In the COMPILER of last week was presented explanations of the code made at the School Directors Convention by Dr. Schaeffer and Dr. Phillips and until some reasonable grounds can be presented for antagonizing the code, all argument are for the code. It will not do to pick out one thing and condemn the whole code by reason of it. When it will benefit present conditions in a dozen or more particulars. The benefits would outweigh the disadvantages so that the code should be received favorably, that is if politicians do not cripple it, as was done with the code two years ago, when Supt. Schaeffer was better content to see it killed than get it in a shape where it was possible to be made a means of harm to the public. But the COMPILER believes that when the code is in a shape to be satisfactory to Dr. Schaeffer it can safely be depended upon to be safe for the public. It is to be hoped that Adams County representatives will be guided by Dr. Schaeffer's view when the code has reached a point to be voted upon. Unquestionably our schools need a chance for further development and it was Adams County that led the way when the common school was brought into being by law and the County should now lead the way when the Code is in a shape to receive the approval of Dr. Schaeffer.

HEALTHY TOWN.

It is worth while to note the significance of things in the passing show. In a recent issue we printed the report of our Board of Health for 1910, showing 44 deaths in a population of 4080, the percentage being eleven to the thousand. The percentage for the whole county is 15 to the thousand and Gettysburg is four to the thousand better off than the average. The average death rate for the county ten years ago was 18 to the thousand. These figures are the proof that this town is a clean, healthy, sanitary place, a most desirable residential town, and this good average is an incentive and admonition to keep the town in its present good sanitary condition. The death rate is kept down by cleanliness The sanitary sewer has contributed to this result and Gettysburg ought to appeal to many who do not live here that it is a good place to live in.

Dramatic Congress Scene.

A most remarkable scene was witnessed on the floor of the House last week during the consideration of the bill to codify, revise and amend the laws relating to the judiciary. The paragraph dealing with the loyalty of the Southern people who may have claims against the Government for property destroyed or confiscated was the item that brought the members to close attention. Just as the clerk finished reading the paragraph, Representative Butler, of Pennsylvania, one of the veteran Republican leaders, made a five minute speech, during which he practically held the House spellbound. He proposed as an amendment to strike out the following language in the clause as to Southern war claimants:

"And the voluntary residence of any such person in any place where, at any time during such residence, the rebel force or organization held sway shall be prima facie evidence that such person did give aid and comfort to said rebellion and to the persons engaged therein."

Hardly had the first words dropped from his lips when every eye in the House was on him. He spoke with an inspiration which won success, and when the vote was taken by yeas and nays his amendment was carried by 165 to 75, and the result was greeted with loud applause. It was the most dramatic thing that has happened in the house in many a day. It was Representative Mann, of Illinois, who forced the rollcall. Mr. Butler said:

"Mr. Speaker, I have not observed the studious care most gentlemen do when making such motions, for the very reason I have not the hope of success that usually attends such efforts, but I desire to relieve myself of a sentimental feeling that deeply affects me when I move to strike this language from the bill.

Defends Non-combathats.

"It is unimportant to the members of this House and the history of the nation where I come from, but, nevertheless, I was born north of Mason and Dixon's line, in a country where most men were loyal to the Union during the Civil War and where we have ceased to call the war a "rebellion" (applause.) However, if I had been engaged therein as a Confederate I would not been offended at having the conflict called a rebellion. I belong to a race of people that never rebelled on any occasion. They never joined an insurrection: neither did they deny the authority of their masters, revile their judges or curse the rulers of their people. If they had been in rebellion they would not, I am sure, have been offended at the designation. This language should not be offensive to them.

"Mr. Speaker, I refer to the class of people of whom you are acquainted, such as the Dunkards, the Mennonites and the Quakers of Pennsylvania. These people during the Civil War lived in peace alone in the valleys of York and Adams and Franklin counties. Many of them did not esteem it necessary to bear arms in defense of our Union to manifest their allegiance to it, neither did they regard a noise as evidence of their loyalty, nor deem it necessary in order to preserve their constancy to their Government that they should commit acts of hostility. We all know that at a certain period of the Civil War General Lee and General Gordon did hold sway in the State of Pennsylvania. We all know that it is in history that at a certain time the Confederates appeared before Chambersburg and there held dominion. It is further known that for two days and a half and for nearly three days General Lee held dominion or 'sway,' in the language of this bill, at Gettysburg, and it is further known that at another period, slightly anterior to this, General Gordon did reach a point in Pennsylvania known as Wrightsville. Whether or not he held sway, dominion or control over the section traveled I do not know, and for the purposes of this statement it is unecessary to know.

Bill Complete Without It.

"This section of the bill is complete, and without this language answers all purposes designed. It must be offensive to the senses of many of the people for whom I speak. To me it is unbearable that it should be thought of them, because they were unfortunate to live, unfortunate enough to dwell, voluntarily in the slaughter pens of the war, with their property at the will of the chief, that they should be charged with disloyalty toward a Union they had maintained ever since their forefathers set it up.

"There is no necessity for this language, which I move to strike out. I repeat what I said at the beginning. I have no hope that it will be stricken out. I will not be particularly sensitive about it if it remains in the bills. I have had the opportunity of speaking for the people I have in my mind at this time, and did have when I made the motion. They are a class of people who did not believe in the philosophy of the Vikings, and that it was necessary to be wounded to be happy. I speak for that class of people who live quietly and humbly in the shadow of their own trees, not listening to the instructions of false moralists, who talk like angels but who live like men. With great feeling I speak to the House and to its membership this one sentence that is in my mind, that these people care I more to live with their faces turned toward the glories of heaven than to join in the demonstrations of hell.

"I will ask the membership of this House to consider whether it is necessary any longer to keep that language in this bill." (Applause.)

THE GRANGE, WHAT IS IT?

R. D. MYERS, SEC. HUNTERSTOWN GRANGE, EXPLAINS.

In an Interesting Article of the Great Work the Grange is Doing for the Farmers.

"Oh! that's an organization devoted to fabulous schemes, which would ruin the Country if they could be enforced.

Large fortunes are the reward of enterprise, and should be encouraged. Men of small natural ability are apt to be jealous of those of greater ability, and the farmers are no exception to the rule, they do not like to see any person richer than themselves, so they are demanding an equalization of taxes, and a larger state appropriation for public schools and roads, to lessen their taxes," Says the heavy capitalist, who fears his taxes may be increased should the people insist upon a just method of taxation and distribution of taxes. "It's nothing but a new political party," growls the office seeker; and they say they want honest men in office.

The Grange; replies the average citizen, who reads and thinks for himself, and is aware that a great movement among the people show that there is some cause for action, and some strong bond of union; is the only true farmers organization of the present day. Its declaration of purposes is as fine a document as was ever written by man, its application to farm life and fine sentiment contained, cannot be surpassed.

With its 43 years of existance it has met with every opposition and has not been found wanting in any particular, its progress is encouraging. In the past year 454 Granges and over 85000 members have been added to the list, all of the States organized show an increase except 4, Penna alone added 42 Granges to her list making her number of Subordinate and Pomona Granges over 700.

In the Grange we farmers declare our intention to meet together, morally, socially, and educationally, to develop a higher and better manhood and womanhood among ourselves, and to labor not only for improvement along agricultural lines, but to educate the agricultural classes in the science of better business methods—and of economical government, in a strictly non partisan spirit. On looking into the subject we have found the financial legislation of the past 10 years or more, unsatisfactory to the people, we believe that laws have been past for the benefit of a few, against the interests of the many, and we believe the time is here for just legislation.

When the political campaign with all its uncertainty and turmoil is over, we farmers have been cheerfully accepting the results and yielding a loyal support to the new administration without regard to whether the man we voted for was elected or not. All we ask at the hands of the government is a square deal, but we find the only true friends to the farmer must be the farmers themselves, and the Grange seeks to equip us for such leadership as will enable us to demand and secure that equitable deal to which the agricultural industry is so justly entitled. The improvement of the business of farming must come out of its own leadership.

In all the efforts made for the betterment of agricultural conditions, we farmers have been considered simply as producers. In other occupations it is different. The manufacturer carefully counts the cost of production and proceeds to control the price by reducing the quantity through the means of tariffs and other special legislation. The professional men fix a schedule of remunerative prices. The merchant marks up his wares to a profitable price, and the transportation companies charge what the traffic will bear.

We are told to work harder and raise bigger crops, so that others may live more economically without regard to whether we receive a profit on what we produce or not. We have been taught to make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before, but when the other fellow gets the extra blade is it not time for us to stop and think?

These conditions have mainly come about because we farmers have been largely letting the other fellow do the thinking. We farmers must blow our own horn, if we do not do it ourselves no one will do it for us, and it is only through our organization that it will sound loud enough to bring results.

The laws of our state and nation are almost wholly made by people controlled by special and selfish interests. There is no way under Heaven by which these conditions can be corrected except through ably directed and loyally supported organization. Give the farmers a fair share of what they produce with an equitable profit upon their hours of toil and all else will be given unto them. Anything short of this leaves increasing need of the Grange and its untiring efforts to secure for agriculture and the farmers some of the comforts and luxuries of life which they so richly deserve. More justice and less sentiment would be more to the liking of most farmers just now.

The Worthy State Master of New Hampshire says, "The affairs of the Grange in N. H. were never in better order, nor has it ever held a higher place in the estimation of the general public, in legislative affairs its influence is sought and feared. What it wants it can get, what it does not want it does not need to take. How about Penn'a? Do we get what we want? If not, whose fault is it?

SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl St., N. Y.

Worthy State Master Creasy says: "The Penn'a State Grange knows how and will manage its own affairs regardless of partisan machine and distillery influence, and we believe it is the duty of the farmers to not only know how to manage their affairs on the farm but also their affairs in the legislative halls.

You may ask what can we do to bring about these better conditions? The first step would probably be in so changing our National and State Constitutions as to provide for the initiative, referendum and recall, and the election of all officials by direct vote of the people.

In no other way can the majority rule. In no other way will we have a government of the people, for the people and by the people. In this way our representatives will be representatives in fact and not our rulers as they are now.

In this way a majority could compel the enactment of a law they want and veto one they do not want. In this way the public officials will be working for the people who pay them and will cease to regard "a public office as a private snap," or "a reward for partisan service."

"Equal rights to all, special privileges to none," is one of the war cries of the Grange. "In essential unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity," is our motto.

We are devoted to the best interests of humanity, which aims to educate the ignorant and help the worker in his hard battle for equal rights, to improve our condition, socially as well as financially, morally as well as intellectually.

An educated people cannot be enslaved, therefore we seek to educate the people on the questions which are most important to their welfare, and to uphold every reform measure which tends to benefit the Nation as a whole.

Another object of the Grange is cooperation in selling as well as buying, not many years ago there was scarcely a manufactoring company or a wholesale house that would sell direct to the consumer, now they are glad to supply us, either as a Grange or as individuals, whereby we save the middlemen's profit.

We know that we have received many benefits through the influence of the Grange, but if all would put their shoulder to the wheel and help to push the good work along, how much sooner would the benefits come to us.

In securing new members for our organization, we have heard some say, "We get all these benefits without joining the Grange and helping to procure them," this is probably true, but some are not willing to go through life sponging from the efforts of others, they prefer to do their share toward improving conditions.

Others say it will not pay, any one using such an argument is certainly ignorant of the benefits that have been and are be derived from a member in our noble order.

It is our aim to get all those persons who are interested in the betterment of agriculture to join the Grange, for we believe that its principles and purposes are sufficiently broad and comprehensive to safeguard all the farmers' interests and do all of the uplift work for the rural people that has been proposed.

To do this work we must be wide awake, alive and progressive to the last degrees.

I hope these few suggestions and remarks may be helpful to some and be received in the kindly and fraternal spirit which they are intended.

R. D. Myers, Sec'y.

Went Into the Conowago.

John Hoffnagle, residing with his brother, H. W. Hoffnagle, at New Oxford, and employed at the Hoover machine shops, had a narrow escape from drowning one evening last week. He went skating on the Conowago creek, near the pumping station, when the ice suddenly gave way under his weight and he sank into the water up to his shoulders. There being no one near to assist, he, by most strenuous efforts, succeeded in breaking his way to shore, which he reached almost exhausted. His cold bath was not very pleasant but he is indeed thankful that he escaped with his life.

CURING A FAD

By W. F. BRYAN

Copyrighted, 1906, by Homer Sprague.

Being fanciful as well as fashionable, Miss Hovey was a faddist, this to the deep sorrow of Dick Fennister, who barely had time to develop an interest in one pursuit before Florence Hovey was off at a new tangent.

Dick had just learned to handle the diabalo when he was called upon to abandon the illusive spinning reel in order to spend his afternoons amid dim lights and odors of incense while a burly Buddhist proclaimed the tenets of fasting and mortification of the flesh to the end that the soul might be enabled to quit its earthly tenement and soar through realms of space.

And then came Batterly. His advent enabled Dick to resume an intimate connection between soul and body and also permitted him to take Florence to luncheon occasionally until Batterly's artistic notions engulfed Miss Hovey even more completely than the Hindoo religion had done.

Batterly knew the value of what actors call "dressing the part," and there was small danger that any one would ever mistake him for other than what he was. The black velvet coat, the straight brimmed high hat and the peg top trousers above sharply pointed French shoes were all delightfully suggestive of the Latin quarter. Florence discarded shirt waists and went in for soft, clinging gowns designed by Batterly. The phraseology of the studio supplanted the words of affection which Dick Fennister had received despite the reigns of other fads.

Things began to look serious, indeed, for Fennister, and none knew it better than himself. Batterly by his very selfishness was the sort of man to attract women, and Dick Fennister feared that if he sought to exercise his rights as a fiance this would serve only to mark the termination of their engagement and precipitate Florence's serious interest in the artist.

Things went from bad to worse, and there came the day when Dick called to take Florence for a walk only to find that she had gone with Batterly. Later it developed that she had gone to his studio to pose for her portrait and that Mrs. Hovey had accompanied them as chaperon, but this did not lighten the situation much.

Thereafter Batterly called daily to escort his sitter to the studio, and with mournful interest Dick watched the trio pass the club window.

Then there came a day when the light of resolve flashed into his eyes, and with positive cheerfulness he turned from the spectacle. Harry Fulton, passing him in the hall, was scandalized to surprise him performing a dance indicative of solemn joy.

"Your own idea?" he asked when Dick saw him and had subsided.

"A poor thing," admitted Dick, "but my own. It is the outward indication of the joy that rises within me."

"It's all right then," was the sarcastic retort. "It seemed rather the outward indication of an inward colic."

He passed on, and Dick headed for the coat room. Ten minutes later he quitted the club.

Mrs. Hovey rather enjoyed the afternoon promenades down the avenue. Batterly's eccentricities, aided by real cleverness with the brush, had made him something of a social lion, and she was proud to have him in leash. She enjoyed the attention which the artist attracted, but this afternoon there was a new expression on the face of those whom they met.

In spite of the occasional "Very clever!" and "How original!" which fell from the lips of passersby there was a flash of levity in the eyes of nearly all. Both Mrs. Hovey and Florence anxiously, if secretly, felt various portions of their dress to see if some disarrangement of their toilets had aroused attention.

But several furtive touches assured them that all was well, and so they gave more attention to Batterly, who reveled in this afternoon parade down the fashionable thoroughfare with the aristocratic matron and her remarkably handsome daughter at his side. He had scorned the suggestion of a carriage, declaring that the walk cleared his brain and enabled him to do his best work.

"This picture shall be my masterpiece," he declared, "if only I am able to do justice to the subject. See! Every one stares at the beauty I am struggling to reproduce upon canvas. It shall make me famous."

"You are already that," reminded Mrs. Hovey. "You will make Florence famous instead."

"No; she is already that," replied the artist. "It needs none to tell that she is the observed of all observers. Today I notice it as never before."

"Do you?" asked Mrs. Hovey uneasily. "It does seem to me that we are attracting unusual attention."

"It is the gown," said Batterly complacently. "It is a triumph. It is a joy to see one's ideals so fittingly realized." He glanced with frank pride at the somewhat conspicuous costume he had designed for Florence and which she was wearing upon the street for the first time. He was inordinately vain, and even the indirect flattery of curious glances was as incense to his soul.

They had almost reached the side street on which Batterly had his studio in an abandoned stable whose rough and dilapidated exterior served only to heighten the effect of the luxurious furnishings within. Suddenly Mrs. Hovey gasped and clutched the artist's arm.

Were it not for the clutch and the feel of bone and muscle beneath she could have sworn that Batterly was advancing toward them with his pompous deliberate stride. Batterly, too, saw the vision and stared.

"It would seem a double," he said. "Tell me, do you see one who looks like me?"

"Two—three," said Mrs. Hovey in gasps, while her eyes filled with fear.

"It cannot be a delusion, since we both see it," said Batterly in relieved tones. "What can it be?"

"There's another!" almost screamed Mrs. Hovey as a third figure came into view. "What can it mean?"

The question was quickly answered, for the first of the false artists was now abreast of them, and, glancing over her shoulder, Mrs. Hovey faced a new surprise. On the black velvet coat was neatly lettered: "Belding, the Artist. Best Photos $3 Per Dozen."

"It is an advertisement," she gasped, "and—and"—

"The people think Mr. Batterly is one of them," said Florence indignantly. "Oh, there's Dick! He'll take us home. We need not trouble Mr. Batterly."

Fennister, perceiving that he was recognized, hurried forward. Florence regarded with approval his correct afternoon dress and turned from the artist in disgust as a sixth double filed slowly past.

"Please take us home, Dick," she said faintly. "It seems that we have been assisting in advertising some cheap photographer."

"Jolly good makeup," said Dick as he stepped between the two women, thereby displacing the artist. "Mr. Batterly saved them the trouble of thinking up an idea for a costu. Let's drop in here and have an ice," he added as they reached a fashionable restaurant. "Perhaps your mother would like"—

"Tea," declared the crimson faced woman. "I was never so mortified in my life, Dick. I wish you'd hurry up and marry Florence if only to cure her of her silly habit of fads."

"With all my heart to the first part!" cried Dick as his glance sought the girl's.

"I'm cured of the second part," added Florence demurely. "What a wonder it was no one used the mahatma for an advertisement for a—a"—

"A minstrel show," said Dick, with a laugh. "He was black enough."

And then Fennister offered up a prayer that it might never be discovered who had planned the advertisement.
